Personalized indexing for the digital equivalent of book pages Book creators, editors, and publishers who use tools like the editing software Word or the publishing system InDesign have been complaining about the waste of paper and resources caused by un-personalized and un-searchable documents for as long as the process of book creation has been around. Now, a developer in the Netherlands has created a personalized digital equivalent of the pages of a book: a file with multiple pages that lists the chapters and other sections in alphabetical order. Each page of the document can be added to a book, and will automatically be linked to the appropriate page. "We noticed that readers want to jump directly to a specific section of a book without having to read the whole book," said Erwin Schneider. "When they reach the chapter that they are interested in, they don't have to read from the beginning." All you need to do is enter a title for the book, and the program will use information from Wikipedia to list the chapters, sections, and other parts of the document. Each page can also be used to generate links to sections of the document, and even contains a little more information about the chapter or section than most online encyclopedias, such as the percentage of words of the chapter that are in that section, and how many words and lines are in the section. You can add your own chapter titles, and then you can choose whether to index only the sections of the book or all of them. All the sections can be ordered to match the order of chapters in a book, and your own chapters can be added to the list. To add a section of the book, just create a blank page with the name of the section you want to add, then follow the instructions on the project site to add all the sections to the same page. Then add the page to your book. "It's pretty easy to use, although it can be a little frustrating that you can't add the title to the book directly," said Schneider. "So if you want to index a book you should first add the name of the chapter in the title, and only then add the chapter."
