Magnetoencephalography (MEG) is a good candidate for non-invasive, low-distortion recordings of local neuronal activity. In this study, we analysed the MEG responses of 9 healthy subjects to computer-generated broadband sounds (1-6 kHz) presented at various levels. After rejection of artefact components, the individual single dipoles were assigned to a cluster corresponding to the auditory cortex. The majority of the dipoles (75% to 95%) identified by different analysis methods showed a rather high degree of correlation in localization as well as in dipole parameters between the individual subjects. We found that the frequency bands and the total power spectrum (i.e. the frequency dependent amplitudes) for the individual cortical clusters were remarkably similar to each other, indicating that the spectral content of the sound stimuli was well adapted. In contrast, the envelopes were quite different. The highest level of inter-individual differences was found for the latency of the MEG response. We suggest that the auditory cortex does not respond to the auditory object, but that the different components of the auditory stimulus are processed in different cortical clusters, especially in the latency range (100-300 ms) of the early evoked MEG response.[Technical changes and errors in cutaneous dermatoscopic procedure].
