Multimedia AutoCAD has built-in support for the playback of movies and sound files. Any movie file created using one of the many industry-standard video formats (including QuickTime, AVI, etc.) can be played in AutoCAD. In addition, by utilizing the existing, built-in video player, Sound, any sound file can be played through AutoCAD, including MP3 files and Windows Media Audio files. Communications AutoCAD provides a method of interfacing with other CAD systems such as MicroStation and NX, as well as with programs using the Microsoft Windows operating system. Communication is made possible by a networking-compatible.NET interface, which is implemented using.NET Framework 4.0. Batch communication can be automated by using AutoLISP, Visual LISP, and even by scripting in Visual Basic or Visual C++. However, not all communication is so automated. For example, the AutoCAD help system is implemented as a web browser-based application, which means that users must browse through the help system one page at a time. Interface The default interface for AutoCAD is the ribbon interface, which consists of three main panes: the ribbon bar, the drawing pane, and the status bar. The ribbon bar is used to display and manage a variety of user interface elements, including the ribbon, toolbars, panels, and drawing viewports. In addition, this pane also hosts the status bar and object status toolbar, which reports information about the state of a user object (such as the position of a spline) in the drawing. The drawing pane is where the user draws and works on the drawing. An area within this pane is reserved for the drawing viewport, which has its own perspective. The viewport can be any size, and can be pinned to the edge of the screen. In addition to the three panes of the ribbon interface, AutoCAD provides additional auxiliary windows, which can be attached to any of the main panes and provide additional features. These include the drawing properties and status windows, the drawing navigation window, and the tools, palettes, and buttons. The status bar and object status toolbar are used to provide information about the state of a user object (such as a spline) in the drawing, as well as to display a three-dimensional representation of a user object (such as a line) that can be manipulated by using three-dimensional
