To obtain a highly active human liver UDP-glucuronosyltransferase, which conjugates several endogenous and xenobiotic substrates with glucuronic acid, an active cDNA clone encoding this enzyme was isolated from human liver. The cDNA contains an open reading frame of 1,485 nucleotides, encoding a protein of 491 amino acids (Mr = 57,518). This sequence is homologous with a number of glucuronosyltransferases of different species. The enzyme of human liver was expressed in Saccharomyces cerevisiae. This yeasts subunit was highly purified and was indistinguishable from the human liver enzyme with regard to its catalytic properties.Q: Refactoring a giant python project? My company is getting a large python project and it needs a lot of refactoring and cleaning up. I am an intermediate python programmer and I can only tell if it is a good approach to refactor a project: do a major restructuring in a sort of modular style (for example, implementing classes with similar features in separate classes), or do what I will do now: just comment out all the lines of code and keep only the comments. How can I choose between these two approaches? A: Documentation and automated tests are the other route to take, not "commenting out code and keeping the comments." Code should be written with a comment at the top to explain the purpose of the code. When code does not meet that requirement, it is a bug. When it does, it is documentation and unit testing

The fellow will gain expertise in psychiatric, behavioral, genetic, and molecular genetic principles and techniques that will ultimately enable him or her to identify the mechanisms underlying gene-environment interactions. Coursework and research projects will be designed to enhance the fellow's understanding of the topics and skills needed to develop as a scientist. The UMass Amherst Center for Statistical Genetics will provide a variety of statistical genetics courses and research resources. The Center for Human Genetic Research will provide research training in human molecular genetics and genomics and will offer a series of seminars to teach the responsible conduct of research. An Advisory Committee will provide scientific and career advice to the fellow. The Fellow's future plans will be incorporated into the training plan. The research focus of the fellow's will be to identify gene-environment interactions affecting developmental psychopathology and to develop/apply statistical genetic methods to enhance genetic research. Two main lines of research are planned. The first line of research will study gene-environment interactions in childhood maltreatment, including a large study of mother-child dyads to test for gene-environment interaction effects on sensitive developmental periods. In addition, we will examine gene-environment interaction effects on two genotypes that may lead to a higher lifetime risk for developing depressive episodes: HPA-axis reactivity and inflammation. The second line of research will examine the interaction between the IL-1 gene and maltreatment on depression and suicidal ideation. The proposed research will also lay the groundwork for a future study that will test gene-environment interaction effects on the effects of stress on adolescent learning and social development. PUBLIC HEALTH RELEVANCE: This is a two-year postdoctoral training award to enable the research trainee to d0c515b9f4
