As a technology, it is behind the times, and its practice of nuclear detonations as the centerpiece of a military strategy is a very old idea that holds no advantages over the alternatives. Hiroshima and Nagasaki were the very opposite of nuclear accidents. They were planned secret bombings that were publicly presented as warnings of the retaliatory power of the US military, but were actually punishment for the Soviet Union's continuing aggression. It's a grim reminder that the very worst thing that can happen to something is often seen as a positive. It took a long time to get to Hiroshima and Nagasaki from the first nuclear tests. Atomic bomb research was carried out from the earliest days of the Manhattan Project through the post-war period, through a series of German bomb tests and by the fledgling nuclear powers to the dawn of the Cold War. And the development of nuclear weapons was not just about the military – not just about the threat to existence of a nation. The military use of such weapons was very little talked about at the time, and the public debates about them were remarkably few and far between, even today.
