programming interface of an application, which makes its functionality available to another application, typically by providing a machine-readable interface. An API interface is one type of application programming interface (API).

The API may be the interface between two or more applications. The two or more applications may be executing in the same execution environment or in separate execution environments. The two or more applications may comprise components of one application, or two or more applications may be separate applications. Different types of APIs have different purposes, and different APIs are appropriate for different purposes. Using an API interface may make the second application interact with the first application. It may be desirable for the first application and the second application to interact in a secure manner, in order to prevent the malicious manipulation of data by one application from affecting the other application. Some APIs use a privilege level process, which is a sort of “dummy” process that is created for the purpose of executing an API and can be used for the purpose of interacting with the API. The privilege level process is typically launched as a privileged process of a privileged user of the system in which the API is executing, and executes at an elevated privilege level. That is, the privilege level process has a higher privilege level than other processes running in the system. A privilege level process may be created for each application that uses the API. For example, the privilege level process can be a user-mode process that has a separate process ID (PID) from other user-mode processes, and has a separate set of process environment variables (and process attributes) from other user-mode processes. A privilege level process may be used in tandem with a virtual machine monitor (VMM), or a hypervisor, to perform guest application testing on the virtual machine. Guest application testing may include testing of the behavior of a guest application by a privileged user, or the VMM, which is capable of running at an elevated privilege level. An API cannot execute every application and cannot protect itself against being compromised and maliciously manipulated to affect other applications. Different applications may have different

Discussion of the Background In general, there have been proposed various image forming methods which use a toner. Examples of such toners include a toner which is prepared by mixing and dispersing a colorant, such as a pigment or a dye, with a binder resin. These toners are used in an image forming method which includes steps of (1) charging, (2) forming a latent electrostatic image, (3) developing the latent electrostatic image using the toner, and (4) transferring the image on a transfer material to obtain a visible image
