This review describes the injection of botulinum toxin type A (BTX-A) into joints as a treatment for chronic pain. The key finding is that the marked improvement of pain and dysfunction seen in some patients is maintained for long periods of time. The clinical studies reviewed focus primarily on the use of BTX-A to treat joint pain associated with myofascial trigger points and related disorders of muscle activation. The studies published to date have not shown statistically significant differences in the success rate of intra-articular (IA) versus intramuscular (IM) BTX-A injections. Only one review has been conducted in which both IA and IM BTX-A injections have been compared. This review includes a comprehensive literature review of published clinical trials of BTX-A administered into the joint. The trials reviewed were conducted in patients with chronic joint pain, musculoskeletal disorders, and myofascial pain. Intra-articular injections of BTX-A were compared to systemic injections or IM injections. The primary treatment outcome measures included pain and function. A secondary outcome measure was the response to BTX-A as measured by pressure algometry and by the patients' perception of therapeutic response.Mind the power: remote
