Therefore, in order to accomplish rapid processing, which allows for the preparation of a high quality image, development must be conducted while maintaining the maximum amount of image forming silver halide in the image forming layer. Furthermore, since the photographic material itself should have storage stability and resistance to pressure, a certain degree of hardness is often required. To give the photographic material the required hardness, softeners or plasticizers are added to the silver halide emulsion layer and other layers which contact the support. However, the presence of these softeners or plasticizers decreases the rapid processing speed of the photographic material. Consequently, additional hardening agents are added to the photographic material to prevent the softening of the photographic layer. Recently, photographic materials using a hardener at the time of processing for the purpose of improving the storage stability and resistance to pressure are disclosed (for example, U.S. Pat.
