The temperature of a lipid film immersed in aqueous solution is determined by the simple Gibbs-Helmholtz equation, while the temperature of a lipid film on a solid surface or encapsulated lipid bilayer is influenced by the Gibbs-Thomson effect. In this paper, we have investigated the monolayer phase transition of the lipid DiC12PC in aqueous solution by microcalorimetry. The lipid monolayer phase transition temperature depends on the water content in the lipid solution. An excess of water causes a significantly higher phase transition temperature. Upon the initial addition of the lipid solution, the heat of solution also increased, suggesting a dehydration of the lipid solution on the calorimeter stage. This dehydration effect is reversible. A comparison of the heat of solution with the height of the monolayer transition and the energy penalty for water incorporation into a lipid film indicates that the dehydration effect is not a surface tension effect. The above discussed dehydration effect is even more pronounced in the case of monolayers formed on surface-modified mica plates. The absence of an effect of the presence of sterols on the monolayer phase transition, in contrast to the other effects, shows that the dehydration effect occurs in the monol

The Challenges Facing South Asian Dental Professionals in Canada. While the majority of South Asian Canadians practice dentistry within their countries of origin, there is no doubt that the number of Canadian dentists of South Asian origin is rapidly increasing. There has been a growing interest in the idea of establishing a speciality of General Dental Practice (GDP) for the majority of dentists of South Asian origin in Canada, including the residents of the subcontinent. Although many of the challenges faced by this group of dentists are similar to those experienced by other groups of dentists, there is one unique aspect to their career experience that warrants mention - immigration. Canada, like other western countries, has a major issue with immigration, and dentists of South Asian origin are no exception. The purpose of this research was to investigate the career issues experienced by dentists of South Asian origin in Canada and to provide recommendations to the profession to assist them manage their professional careers within this context. A cross-sectional online survey was distributed to a convenience sample of dentists of South Asian origin in Canada to assess their career issues and the barriers to achieving their professional goals. Among the respondents, nearly half of the participants spent less than five years in Canada following immigration.

Graduation in India was the primary pathway to qualify and to begin a practice. The majority of respondents to the survey practised GDP, and approximately one in three worked in the public sector. Over 70% of the participants believed they were successful in their career. Most participants reported that the barriers to their professional growth were related to language, lack of practice-based education or training, culture, and lack of mentorship. The results of this study identified various personal and professional barriers to South Asian dental professionals in Canada and provided novel recommendations for the profession to address these challenges.
